Wagoner county and I now live in the county of Clark of the State

Jacob Upp, great-grandfather of G. H. Hazen on his mother's side, was born in the town of Little York, Pennsylvania in the year 1751. When the Revolutionary War began, he joined a company of volunteers in Little York that was sent with other troops to reinforce General Washington at Long Island. Soon after that, a battle was fought at that place and the American forces were defeated. He and many other American soldiers were taken prisoners.

They were taken on a British man-of-war and sent to New York and held as prisoners of war for a long time before being exchanged. After his discharge, he was united in marriage with Miss Elizabeth Sprinkle, a daughter of Michael Sprinkle. In 1779, he, his father-in-law, Michael Sprinkle and his six sons and their families came west to the Falls of the Ohio. (now Louisville, Ky.) where a settlement had been formed.

In 1792, Michael Sprinkle, five of his sons, Jacob Upp, and their families, removed west, to what at that time was called "Red Banks," which is now Henderson, Ky., and located there. A few months after settling near Henderson, Jacob Upp was captured by the Indians and taken to their country in the north and held as a prisoner for several months.

He finally escaped and returned to his family near Henderson. He and his wife raised a large family and lived to be a good old age. He was the father of Catherine Upp, wife of the late Judge G. H. Roberts.

In the spring of 1793, John Upp, like his father, Jacob, was captured by the Indians and taken off to their country and held in captivity for several years. With him, they took George Sprinkle and Isaac Knight. Finally John Upp and George Sprinkle were surrendered to American soldiers at Fort Wayne, Ind. and later on returned to their homes at Henderson, Kentucky.

(read journal of John Upp)

Fort Wayne, Ind., was originally Kekionaga, Capital of the Miami Indian nation. It was of great importance during the French fur trading period. Here was the portage between the Maumee and Wabash Rivers-----the only seven miles of land to be crossed in the otherwise all-water route between Montreal and New Orleans. Fort Wayne was the site of a French fort and also of Harman's defeat by the Miami Indians.

In 1803, when France was transferring the great Louisiana purchase to our country, Major John Sprinkle, with his wife Susanna, two children, Michael and Nancy, and his mother and father came to the site on which our town was built.

They had left their Pennsylvania home many years before, probably coming down the Ohio on a flat-boat and stopped at Louisville, where they entered land. Becoming dissatisfied with their new home, they migrated to Tennessee, and then back to Kentucky, this time to Henderson Co. But now they dared to move into the great Indiana Territory, where slavery would be unknown.

John Sprinkle had obtained the title of Major Sprinkle while living in Kentucky, where he was an officer of the state militia and was considered a man of honor and social standing.

The father (John Sprinkle) looking for locations found a hill which he liked and the anvil was carried to the spot where the first Methodist Church was erected many years later.

Eight brothers and sisters came to keep Michael and Nancy company.

John Sprinkle bought the first lot in Darlington,-----. It seems strange that John Sprinkle did not push the selection of the land in which he was interested with its choice piece of river front, its deep harbor, its sloping banks and 20 miles of straight-away view up the river and of which he had become the proprietor in 1812, General Johnson having assigned it to him.

But John was a blacksmith, and no doubt his time was taken up with the affairs of his trade, and the rearing of his large family, and he left the running of public affairs to the politicians just as we do now.

----Mrs. Elisha Williams of Yankeetown says that when John Sprinkle went to Vincennes to enter land, he located down the Ohio and paddled up the Wabash in a canoe.

The History of Newburgh

— by —

MARION KOEGEL COX

A town or country is what people make it. So we are interested in the lives of those who helped build our town, and who carried on the work of the early days in such a way that we have been able to carry on, while so many towns have passed into forgetfulness.

The First Settler

This year we are looking backward to our beginnings to a time when our hills and valleys were primitive forests overlooking our then main connecting link with the world at large — the broad Ohio River. The town of Newburgh is located on the scene of one of the earliest settlements in Warrick County. The land was purchased by the U. S. Government on June 4, 1807, and comprised two hundred and five acres. John Sprinkle, perhaps the first white settler in the county, became the owner of this land.

John Sprinkle, a native of Pennsylvania, had moved to Kentucky in 1772. In 1803 he left Kentucky and in that same year a quaint flatboat, manned by sturdy rivermen, brought Grandfather and Grandmother Sprinkle, their son, John, and his wife, Susanna, and two small children around the bend, which is said to be the longest straight line from curve to curve on the Ohio River. A landing was made near a stream of limpid water and the first family to reach Southwestern Indiana came ashore. He was a blacksmith and his anvil and forge were soon set up on the side of the hill where the Old Methodist Church later stood, now the property of Mrs. Myrtle Scales.) His log cabin was built on the site now owned by Godfrey Steele. The burial ground was on the hill where Mr. and Mrs. S. A. Brentano now reside. Tradition claims that the bodies were removed from this burial site to Sharon. However no markers can be found to prove this.

There is something fascinating about the ring of an anvil and the sight of sparks flying. Wherever they are, people come. Soon the smithy of John Sprinkle became the nucleus of a settlement.

Pioneer Days

By 1813, Warrick County (comprised of what is now Posey, Spencer, Vanderburgh and Warrick Counties) had established her county seat at Darlington, a few miles east of the Sprinkles settlement. So now a trail led east to Darlington and onward to Corydon, the state Capital. This trail known as the "Old Fredonia Road," entered the town on what is now Circassian Street, met, and crossed the state road (now State Street) at the corner where Mrs. Clara Folz resides. It continued westward from the Presbyterian Church corner, later becoming our present Main Street. Then we had two main roads and travel over them so reached the horse, mule and ox-cart stage. The activity along with increased travel on the river brought more and more business to the Sprinkle Blacksmith Shop.

A part of the town was laid out in 1818 by Chester Elliott, an early surveyor, for John Sprinkle and called Sprinklesburg. Another settlement was named Mt. Prospect. A few years subsequently Abner Luce purchased a tract of land adjoining Sprinklesburg and in 1829 he laid out the town of Newburgh.

Settlements such as this, remote from settled neighborhoods, were always attended with great hardships and privations which none but the brave would endure. Let us remember that the main object in coming to this wild region was to secure free land for homes and not a love for adventure nor lust for fame or gold. They endured blood-curdling adventures and privations that we might enjoy our present goodly heritage.

In these early days people were very poor but also very friendly and neighborly. Each family had to grind its own meal for bread and also bake it. In fact, each family had to be almost self supporting. Keeping clothed was one of the greatest struggles and their strenuous lives were very bare on clothes. Upon the pioneer women fell the burden of providing the clothing. Spinning, weaving and dyeing of woolen cloth was a long and tedious process. Often the skins of animals were used for winter clothing. The problem of clothing was a little simpler in the summer for coarse cottons and calicos could be made up into scant dresses and sunbonnets. However, as the women in this vicinity were unable to weave cotton yarn on their coarse looms, cotton materials had to be brought in, and often merchandise was transported and exchanged for cotton materials from the southern states.

In 1814, a party of men began boring for salt on Cypress Creek. Think of what an undertaking to obtain salt, so necessary in the preservation of food, especially meat. It was a great day, when in 1818, a coal mine was sunk on nearby Pigeon Creek.

Newburgh founder spelled name Sprencel it seems, not Sprinkle

May - 1969

By SALLY K. DIAZ

Newburgh, the town that has had difficulty spelling its own name, apparently never has learned the proper spelling of the name of its founder.

Until now, everybody at Newburgh thought that the name of the Pennsylvania blacksmith who founded the town in the early 1800s was John Sprinkle.

But Mrs. Lawrence Lant of 6000 Lincoln has been tracing the Sprinkle family and has found Newburgh's founding father really was John Sprencel. The information came over the weekend in a letter to Mrs. Lant from the Historical Society of York County, Pa., Sprinkle or Sprencel's birthplace.

And what is more, Sprencel was one of three brothers all named John Sprencel — something Newburgh descendants of the family did not know. They also were unaware of the difference in the spelling of their family name and did not know which of the John Sprencels was their ancestor.

RECORDS in York County show the Sprencels were John Michael, John Jacob and John Henry, all sons of Michael Sprencel, who accompanied one of the sons to Newburgh in 1803. The elder Sprencel later bought a tract of land in Henderson County, Ky., and died there in May, 1816.

Mrs. Lant was tracing the Sprencel family for the Newburgh chapter of the Daughters of the American Revolution, of which she is a member. The DAR had organized at Newburgh in 1966 as Set-te-tah Chapter, taking the name of a Shawnee Indian chief who camped near Paradise.

But in past months, members of the group had become unhappy with the name since they learned Set-te-tah was blamed for a massacre of the Atha Meeks family living along the Warrick - Spencer county line back in May, 1811.

At Mrs. Lant's suggestion, the chapter voted last week to change its name to the John Sprinkle (or Sprencel) unit, a move subject to approval by the national federation.

ACCORDING to Mrs. Lant, the John Sprencel who founded Newburgh moved to the Falls of the Ohio River at Louisville in 1772 where he became a captain of the George Rogers Clark Expedition of the Kentucky Militia.

In 1803, Sprencel moved down the Ohio River to Newburgh where he built a blacksmith shop along what today is Jennings Street.

Nine years later, Sprencel took another trip on the log raft which brought him to Newburgh — this time to the Territorial Land Office at Vincennes where he obtained two land grants signed by President James Monroe. The documents, presented to "John Sprinkle," are today in the possession of Sprencel's great-granddaughter, Mrs. Wilbern Schmitt, of Newburgh.

59 110 year old document reveals the story of one man's captivity among the Pottowatomie Indians

Edited by Amy Nassmore Hunt

I make no excuse for the style and orthograp^y of my first and last production. The frontier of Kentucky a half century ago (1800) was a poor school for the instruction of writing, with the use of the gun being taught in preference to that of the pen, and the study of Indian warfare taking precedence over composition.

I was born in the town of Little York, Penn sylvania, in the year 1781. My father, Jacob Uppe, was born in the same fertile valley.

A strong and sturdy man, with a ready smile,
my father served an apprenticeship as a blacksmith;
then responded to a call for volunteers in Little York to join the American troops already stationed in Long Island under the command of General George Washington.

from app. dated 1775
in N. C. 129. 1775 (2)

MY FATHER, was captured during a battle with the British and, after living on black water and mouldy bread for several months, was released in a prisoner exchange and returned home.

In 1778, at the age of 27, my father married his childhood sweetheart, Elisabeth Sprinkle. From what I have since learned, my mother was a pretty, shy, and deceptively fragile "Pennsylvania Dutch" girl, with dark hair and soft blue eyes. I use the word "deceptively" because the hardships she was to endure proved her anything but fragile. Like most frontier women, she had both grit and iron in her makeup.

I arrived in the third year of my parents' marriage. I remember nothing of my birthplace, but I was told later that Little York was then an important outfitting station for the great numbers of pioneers who were making their way westward beyond the Alleghenies, even before the Revolution. Their destination was the vast area of the fur trade with the Indians in the Ohio Valley and vicinity.

Undoubtedly the sight of hundreds of pack trains with their horses and mules, one tied to the tail of another, the ox-carts and occasional "land frigates" being outfitted in York Town had something to do with it. At any rate, my father and grandfather began talking more and more about joining these emigrants.

I was just a little feller when the whole family left Little York for Redstone, in southwestern Pennsylvania. Redstone (now called Brownsville) was the former site of an Indian fortification. Around it lived a few settlers and to the hundreds of westward-traveling emigrants like us, it marked the end of a wearisome journey over the mountains. The broad, sparkling Monongahela River was a welcome sight indeed.

After a year's residence in Redstone, where he plied his trade as a blacksmith, Father acquired enough money to pay his share of the outfit needed to proceed farther west. Our destination for the moment was Pittsburgh. It was little more than a fort—indeed, many people were still calling it Fort Pitt. It had risen almost on the ashes of historic Fort Duquesne which the French had blown up at the approach of the British troops. It had once been attacked by Chief Pontiac and had about 100 houses and cabins around it when we arrived.

We tarried only a short time in Pittsburgh, then we embarked by boat down the Ohio. After descending some 600 miles, we came to the Falls of the Ohio, a series of rapids where the river drops at least 25 feet within the space of a mile. At the Falls we left the river, near a settlement, Louisville, Kentucky, sometimes called the Falls City. My father had decided he liked the look of the land. The spot my father chose in the dense forest dripping with moisture and moss, was almost sunless. But he and my grandfather and older uncles cleared the black ground—so different from the red soil of our native Pennsylvania—and there they built cabins for our use.

The settlement nearby, my mother learned with dismay contained only a couple dozen inhabitants who were constantly harassed by roaming bands of Indians who would lurk in the underbrush for the purpose of taking prisoner those who might be caught outside the settlement. They also ran off with the settlers' horses and cattle and fired at the flatboats of the whites on the river. Louisville was particularly troubled this way because it afforded the Indians a chance to elude their pursuers by recrossing the river in their canoes.

I was outside one day, watching my father fashion an axe handle from hickory, when a strange man appeared. He had come down the Ohio in a flatboat and had stopped at the Falls to engage a number of men to assist him in a plan to kill bear and buffalo, salt the meat and sell it in the New Orleans market. The pay was good, and my father was one of the first of the settlers to sign up to accompany him. Their trip to New Orleans in a pirogue—a boat made from a single tree trunk, hollowed out—was uneventful but profitable. The party killed not only bear and buffalo but elk in abundance.

When they had finished their business in the southern city, they prepared to return home on horseback. They had proceeded but a short distance, however, when they learned that the Creek Indians had waylaid and murdered several land parties. Accordingly, the men returned to New Orleans, where they remained until fall. Then, joining a second group of travelers for greater safety, they all started for home again. Unfortunately, they ran out of food and discovered that my father's party had lost all their money. They had been paid in silver and it proved too heavy, for it wore holes in the saddlebags in which it was carried.

"Father hid in the briar bushes two days. Twice the Indians almost stepped on him."

Knowing that it was scattered back along the trail, my father and several others decided to go back in search of it. Not expecting to be gone long, they foolishly left their guns with those who remained behind, with the under-

The money was found, but when they turned back, they discovered that their former companions had gone on, taking all the guns with them. My father's group hurried on, but in their eagerness, they lost the trail.

Here they were in a vast wilderness, hundreds of miles from home, without guns or food, and no way to protect themselves from the Indians. Discussing their situation, they agreed that they might as well lie down and die. But they were frontiersmen, so they pushed on, sustaining themselves by eating bark and roots and hoping for the best. Suddenly, they stumbled upon a well-worn trail. Deciding to follow it, they soon found themselves in Nashville, Tennessee. Gaunt, weary and half-starved, they rested there a few days, then went on to Louisville, arriving safely.

They had been gone exactly 12 months!

We lived in Louisville about six years. It was here my ill-fated little brother, Jacob, Jr., was born.

One day, at the behest of one Major Smith, my father and grandfather were persuaded to make a trip farther down the Ohio, to a place known as Red Banks. The year was 1792, the same year Kentucky became a state. They liked what they found there. The land was thick with trees—ash, oak, sycamore, maple, hickory, elm, black walnut and so on. Game in this virgin area proved abundant, so Father and Grandfather decided to break ground here for cabins and a cornfield. It was back-breaking work, for the giant walnuts in particular were hard to fell. When the land was cleared, the cabins built and the corn harvested, my father and grandfather returned to the Falls for the purpose of moving us all to our new home.

Upon our return to Red Banks, we learned that several families had moved into the neighborhood during our absence. My mother's joy at having neighbors was quickly blighted, for they proved to be villains of the first order, as tricky as the Indians and robbers besides. We kept our distance from them.

But the settlement continued to grow around Red Banks with the coming of some other very fine settlers, and in 1799 it was renamed Henderson, Kentucky. Both Indians and whites often referred to Kentucky as the Hunting Ground. Later, the region became known as the Dark and Bloody Ground because of the fierce battles waged there between the whites and Indians. No particular tribe claimed the area as its own, but all tribes hunted there. Much of this was before my time, perilous as I found it.

As soon as our families were (Continued on page 82)

HOW THE JOURNAL WAS FOUND

The editor of this 110-year-old journal, Amy Passmore Hurt, is the wife of John Upp's present-day descendant. Throughout her married life, Mrs. Hurt, herself a professional writer, has been fascinated by this document, which was written long after the events described, when John Upp was 70, and passed down through successive generations of her husband's family. About 20 years ago, a typewritten copy was made of the original document (which was beginning to deteriorate) and was given to Mr. Hurt, so he would have a record of the experiences of his distant kinsman during the Revolution and the westward migration which followed. Because of the length of the document, Mrs. Hurt has cut repetitive sections and bridged them with brief connecting passages and has done considerable research to correct and add places, names and background that were vague or incorrect in the manuscript. Otherwise this is John Upp's own journal, his remembrances of a wild country still in its adventurous infancy.

made snug and comfortable in our new cabins, my father and two of my uncles, Michael, Jr. and Jacob Sprinkle, together with Henry Nolin, a neighbor, started up the Ohio in a pirogue in search of stone to be used in my father's new blacksmith shop.

Returning with the stone, the men decided to spend the night ashore and set some traps they had taken along. Beaver was plentiful near a pond a little ways from the shore in a place known to Nolin. The men tied their boat to a tree by the shore and set up camp by stretching blankets over some tree branches.

The next morning Nolin and Uncle Michael went to fetch the traps, leaving Father and Uncle Jacob behind to pack up. Seeing that one of the row-locks on the pirogue was out of order, Father left Uncle Jacob on the shore to watch for Indians while he repaired it. Unseen by either, six Kickapoo Indians came upon them. Jacob was sitting with his back against a tree and the first he knew of their presence was when one Indian jerked him to his feet. He fought off his attacker and ran for the river. He had no gun and hoped to escape by swimming away. Although he was an excellent swimmer, he was greatly hampered by his clothing. Seeing this, the half-naked Indians threw off their blankets and took after him. They overtook him and fetched him back to shore.

Meanwhile, my father, who was unable to swim and who had no weapon either, save a knife, cut the boat's cable and endeavored to put out into the river. But the river was high and a quantity of driftwood had collected about the pirogue in the night. He was unable to free it by himself and four of the Kickapoos rushed upon him and took him prisoner. In the struggle, he dropped his knife, which was left lying in the boat. The Indians tied the two white men securely to a tree and after prancing around them with uplifted war clubs for a while, they untied my father and uncle and started off with them.

When my other uncle and Nolin returned, they immediately guessed what had happened. Seeing a white man's footprints leading to the river and knowing Father couldn't swim, they hoped that Uncle Jacob at least had escaped. They then jumped into the pirogue and headed for home. No pursuit was attempted, since there would not have been sufficient men left to protect the women and children at home, should the Indians still be lurking nearby.

My mother was outside, sifting white hickory ashes into game fat melting in a big copper kettle to make soft soap when the news came. She screamed, "No, No! It isn't so!" So great was her distress that she stumbled against the kettle, spilling some of its hot contents on her foot. She appeared utterly unconscious of the pain. In a few hours, with the stoicism of the frontier woman, she had accepted the news, but the grief she bore was great.

I can't say that we suffered physically from my father's absence. My male relatives kept us supplied with wood and both fresh and smoked game. There was corn for meal and parching. We children gathered hickory nuts for the hogs and ourselves. There were berries and black walnuts too, and we gathered wild honey at the risk of stings and welts. Snow soon lay thick outside, but inside the cabin it was warm and comfortable and fragrant with the odor of broiling deer meat and burning logs in the fireplace.

Like most frontiersmen, Father had made chairs hewn from hickory blocks and three-legged stools from the same wood. A large slab or two with four legs served as a table, with other tables built permanently against the walls, their outer edges held up by two legs. Our beds were built into the walls in the same fashion and softened for sleep with mattresses of dried moss, pine needles and corn husks. The light was not too good, for our small windows had paper windowpanes, the paper greased with bear's fat. At night, our light was furnished by burning pine knots or candles of bear's grease.

Mother kept busy with her housework and making moccasins of leather tanned and dressed from deerskins. Her loom furnished the cloth from which she made our clothing. We children kept the knives and tomahawks sharpened for possible attacks by the Indians and helped our elders with tanning hides. Sometimes we'd gather around the fireplace and sing some of the fine old Lutheran hymns my mother had learned in Little York.

In the meantime my father and uncle were taken by the Indians across the Ohio, in a northwesterly direction. The second day they arrived on the Wabash River. Crossing the river on a raft they built, they saw a boat coming downriver, and the Indians forced Father and Uncle Jacob to call the boatmen ashore. The two obeyed, at the same time motioning the boatmen to go back. The strangers understood and commenced pulling toward the opposite shore. The Indians, angry at being foiled, came out of the brush and began firing at them, without success, however. Then they proceeded to beat my father and uncle.

The prisoners were well-tied and guarded, even at night, so there was no escaping. When the Kickapoos reached their particular village, they sold my father to two old Indians who, together with their squaws, lived in one hut.

Father was forced to work in the cornfields with the squaws, gathering the crop. After that, the two Indian men decided to go hunting, leaving my father to be guarded by the women. At first they kept eagle eyes on him, then one morning one of the squaws untied him and sent him outside for wood.

Proceeding some distance from the camp, Father quickly struck a course for home. After a while, seeing a grove of trees in the direction he wished to go, he crawled backward through the tall grass toward it, pulling the grass erect after him to hide his tracks. When he reached the grove, he saw that other Indians had been there, for their campfire was still smoldering. Shortly after an Indian discovered his trail. Father took refuge in some greenbriar bushes. The fact that many Indians had been in the vicinity and had trampled the ground thoroughly, worked to his advantage. When they couldn't find him, they left.

But he had learned their wily ways and he made no attempt to escape that day, famished though he was. He rejoiced at his wisdom the next day, for the Indians returned. Searching for him again, they called him by his Indian name, "Shocky." He knew the squaws had spread word of his escape. Twice they almost stepped on him, but finally they gave up and left once more.

On the seventh day of his escape, Father reached the Illinois River, weak and hungry and almost unable to walk. I had subsisted mostly on slippery elm bark, whose inner surface is coated with a thick, gluey substance that allays hunger and thirst.

He sat down on the river's shore, pondering what he should do about making a raft to float down the river. Suddenly he heard the report of a gun. Thinking it might have come from the whites, he walked toward the sound. To his dismay, he saw a band of Indians who spotted him immediately. But they were friendly and cared for him until he was strong again. Then he started by boat for home, going by the Wabash to its mouth and then down the Ohio.

But once in sight of our cabin, he began screaming. My mother heard him and recognized his voice. They remained in each other's arms for a long time. Then the other settlers crowded around him to welcome him home and to hear of his adventures. It was a happy occasion for us all.

The happy times for the family ended abruptly the next spring, in 1793.

It began one morning when my two younger uncles, Peter and George Sprinkle, our friend Isaac Knight, my little brother, Jacob, then six, and I, who was 12, crossed the Ohio on a raft to the Indiana shore for the purpose of amusing ourselves. While running and jumping on the bank, we suddenly discovered an Indian "blind" among the cane and in a number of Indians.

They were watching our every movement. Terrified, we all started to run. Peter, the eldest, who was about 17, attempted to reach the river and escape by swimming. Before he reached the water, three guns were fired and he fell dead. Then, to my everlasting horror, little Jacob was torn from me and tomahawked to death. Catching the others now, the Indians then scalped Peter and Jacob before our eyes, holding up the scalps in full view of the opposite shore, should anyone be watching. Then, giving a terrible war-whoop, they started north with us three remaining boys.

You can imagine how I felt—as though I were in the grip of a horrible nightmare. It was with an awful sense of unreality that I finally realized that my little brother was dead and I was a captive of the Potawatomis.

During the first day's march, I, being the smallest, had to run nearly all the time to keep up with the others. If I lagged behind, the Indians would cut switches and use them on me. Toward evening I became so fatigued that even the threat of being tomahawked failed to hasten my speed. Then two Indians, one on each side of me, pulled me along.

We stopped about 10 o'clock for the night. Fearing to betray our whereabouts, our captors did not build a fire and we ate cold food. After the meal, the Indians wrapped up in their blankets and went to sleep. We three boys scraped up some leaves and slept on them, or tried to.

By this time we had learned that two of our captors were Kickapoos. The Potawatomis lived in the Great Lakes area while the Kickapoos lived along the Wabash and Vermilion Rivers. The two tribes, together with the Miami, Menden and Wea tribes, all spoke the Algonquian language.

Early next morning, we resumed our march. A short time later the Indians killed three bears and took along as much of their flesh as they could carry. When we reached the Wabash, they stopped to cook for the first time. We walked for ten days this way and then something happened that makes my blood turn cold, even now. After kindling a fire one evening, the Indians cut the fleshy part from the inside of the scalps of Peter and Jacob, roasted it on the end of a stick and then divided it up among themselves, each consuming a portion. Watching them, we boys all threw up. The scalps were then stretched over a hoop and put before the fire to dry. That night, and every night thereafter, the Indians performed a war dance around the scalps, a rite in which we were forced to participate.

We finally reached a Kickapoo village and the two members of that tribe left us. On the 15th day, we reached another village on the Illinois River, the home of the six Potawatomis.

Once inside the village, we were closely inspected. Then some of the Indians began pulling out our hair, intending to leave a small tuft on top, Indian style. But we all screamed, so they resorted to the more humane method of cutting it off. They also attempted to put rings in our ears and noses. George and Isaac endured this stoically, but I yelled so hard that they managed to ornament my ears only.

That night Isaac got sick and George and I got little sleep as a result. He was still sick the next morning, so the Indians let him be and only George and I were stripped of our clothing and had our bodies painted red. After this ceremony, a number of the Indians came and shook hands with us solemnly. Apparently we were now Indians too!

Shortly thereafter, we were taken to a wigwam across the river where we were given sour hominy with a little sugar on it. The fact that the squaw who dished it up had used the ladle on the dog did not stop us from eating heartily, we were so famished.

We almost lost our meal a little later, though, when George and I were ordered out to witness a war dance performed on a grand scale, when the whole village danced around Peter's and Jacob's scalps, which were held aloft on poles by two squaws.

This concluded our first full day in our new home.

The next morning the villagers celebrated the return of the six members who had captured us by having a ball game. Both "braves" and squaws participated. Toward evening they had a feast, with two or three hundred of the Indians marching in procession to the wigwam where we boys were kept. They beat drums, rattled deers' hooves and made other sounds. The contents of two large kettles which had been set down on the green nearby was divided equally among all present. Knowing the Potawatomis preferred dog flesh for their ceremonials, I dreaded eating. However, the food proved to be hominy.

The following day, George and I were permitted to visit the other wigwams. Isaac was still sick. We were treated kindly by the squaws. This day I was sold to an Indian, who also bought George when he learned we were related. Poor Isaac was sold too, sick though he was, to another Indian.

Shortly after buying me, my new master took George and me down to the edge of the river and told us to wade into it and dip our heads under the water. We were made to go through the ceremony three times. Later, we were told by three white men, who were already captives of the Potawatomis when we arrived, that this ceremony was performed to "wash the white blood from our veins" and that we were now the adopted sons of our Indian master.

Meanwhile, our own clothes were taken away and we were given complete Indian outfits. My "father" then told me I would be known as "Panther" thereafter.

Five days later the Indians broke camp and started up the Illinois River. After several days' travel along its banks, we left it and reached a river that emptied into Lake Michigan. Here was located the Indians' summer home. Almost immediately our father showed George and me a kind of knoll which he made us dig into. When we had dug down to the level of the ground, we came to a pit lined with bark. In the pit was deposited corn from the previous fall. It was put in sacks made from the inner bark of the linden tree. We found the corn in perfect condition.

We had been in our new home only a short time when our father came down with smallpox. George and I knew then what had ailed Isaac, but we said nothing, fearing we would pay with our lives for having introduced the dreaded disease to this group of Indians.

Their treatment for smallpox consisted of putting the patient in a "sweat-house," until he was drenched with perspiration, then dunking him in the river. This treatment was given to our father who, after the dunking, was put into a separate hut. George and I were made to care for him and given a concoction of roots to administer to him. As might be supposed, the treatment the Indian received hastened his death. He lived but a day thereafter. Thinking we had given him poison, the other Indians made George and me drink what was left of his medicine.

How we escaped the disease, I'll never know. Only a few days later his squaw became ill and died. That was just the beginning, for each succeeding day thereafter, saw the death of one or more members of the tribe.

Each warrior, like our father, was buried in the same manner. He was put into a rough box, or coffin, with his knife, gun, tomahawk, pipe, tobacco and a quantity of food. Each brave's favorite hunting dog was killed and buried in the same grave. All this was done to provide for the warrior until he reached the "better hunting ground."

During that summer, George and I worked hard in the cornfields, guarded by an old squaw. When the time came for the corn to ripen, we were kept in the fields to frighten the blackbirds away. The Indians' dogs would sometimes raid the fields, breaking down the stalks and gnawing the ears like raccoons. Half-starved ourselves, we got permission to eat the corn left by the dogs. When they did not break it down fast enough, we helped them. One day, being caught in this, we were forbidden to eat any corn, spoiled or otherwise!

Soon after my Indian father's death, I fell into the hands of his brother-in-law—one of the most brutal men I have ever known. If anything at all went amiss when I was about—and he invariably made me accompany him on all his fishing and hunting expeditions—I was blamed and beaten. My agony was his greatest pleasure.

When the corn was harvested and stored in the linden bags within the knolls, a grand feast was held to please the great Manito so that he would bless the next hunting season. Again fearing dogs would be the fare, I dreaded eating, but hominy was served and we two boys were given wooden bowls and spoons and told to eat. We needed no urging, but after a while we could swallow no more. We started toward our wigwam, only to be jerked back by my master and told to eat more. Nothing of the food must remain lest the Great Spirit be angry. Everybody started eating again, but there was still too much food.

Runners were then sent around to neighboring villages with a request that the other Indians come help dispose of the food. Finally, not a bit was left.

The Indians' hunting grounds were about 300 miles away from their villages. Hunting was poor that year, notwithstanding the feast. Game of all kinds was scarce, so George and I were allowed only the entrails of those animals that were killed. The entrails of the raccoons we would turn inside out, wash thoroughly, then broil on the coals. Prepared in this manner, they tasted very good. After the hunt was over, there was another big feast, then we returned to the former villages for the winter.

The second summer George and I spent with the Indians was a repetition of the first. We worked in the cornfields, we went hungry and we despaired of ever seeing our own homes again. I'm not ashamed to say that, big boys though we were, we wept many times for family and home.

Toward fall, my Indian father's brother came and took me away, in order to remove me from the cruelty of my second master. After all, he said, I was the adopted son of his brother and therefore deserving of better treatment.

When we got to his home, I was placed on the level with his own sons. His squaw seemed kindly disposed to. She even told me once that she wished I was with my own mother! Catching at even the faintest hope of returning to my parents, I told her that if she would let me go, I could find my way home. But she said that a boy going that distance alone would certainly get lost in the woods, starve to death, or fall prey to less considerate Indians. Although I missed George terribly, I was happier in my new home.

On one occasion my new master told both me and his sons that he wished us to fast, so we blacked our faces and abstained from food that entire day and night. When morning came, we were informed that we must fast yet another day and night. This was not welcome news, but we had no choice. On the following morning our father came and asked one son what he had dreamed about during the night.

"I dreamed I killed a fine fat bear," said the boy.

Then the Indian asked me the same question. Instinctively but not truthfully, I said, "I dreamed of a big cornfield with yellow pumpkins covering the ground."

These answers pleased our father and he returned in a short time with plenty of food for us all.

I soon learned that these Indians were visited frequently by French traders who brought trinkets, blankets and so forth to exchange for furs and skins. It was from one of these traders that my Uncle Michael, who then carried on a gunsmithing business in Vincennes, had learned of the whereabouts of George and myself. He immediately wrote a letter to the Indians, informing them that if they would send or bring George and me to Vincennes, he would give them a very fine rifle. The letter was given to the chief of our village by one of the traders.

Now, a rifle is one of an Indian's most prized possessions, and this promise of a rifle was the greatest temptation. Imagine my joy, then, when my Indian family told me that they would accept Uncle Michael's offer.

In the meantime, my Indian father got in touch with George's master to get ready to bring him along, adding that they should also bring a Negro man who lived among them to act as an interpreter.

This Negro was considered a very "big man" among the Indians. He spoke English, Algonquian and French. Besides, he was the owner of a large tract of land and he had not only a trading post, but a blacksmith shop, a horse-mill where he made a poor quality flour and a number of looms on which he turned out bolting cloth. It would have been unnecessary to employ him as an interpreter, for both George and I could now speak the Indians' language as well as they, but they did not trust us. The Negro joined us at the shore of Lake Michigan, from where we prepared to start our journey. He rode a horse. The rest of us walked, keeping close to the lake shore. Our destination, we learned, was Fort Wayne. With the exception of the Negro, we became footsore and weary, long before we reached the Fort.

Just outside the stockaded walls on the banks of the Maumee River, the Indians hoisted a white flag. Almost immediately a ferry boat was sent over to carry us across. We were no sooner inside the Fort than we were offered food. The military men gave us some light-bread, the first I had tasted since I had left home and the best I ever ate!

Then the officers and the half-dozen Indians, using the Negro as the interpreter, began negotiating for our release. The Negro showed the letter Uncle Michael had written, promising a rifle for our return. But the officers refused to give the Indians anything, although they said they had no doubt Uncle Michael would keep his promise if the Indians proceeded with us to Vincennes as requested. The Indians refused to do this, saying the distance was too great. They would settle for an Army rifle, they said. The officers still refused.

When the Indians saw there was no swaying the Fort officers, they left sullenly, camping a short distance from the Fort. From there they tried to induce George and me to visit them, but the officers would not permit us to do so—not that we wanted to! We all knew that the Indians would either poison us or take us captive again.

Finally convinced that they could accomplish nothing by staying, the Indians and the Negro and his servant departed. A few days later, when a couple of French traders arrived at the Fort, they proposed that we accompany them to Vincennes. The officers agreed to this and had a pirogue hauled across the Maumee River to the Wabash for our use. We took leave of our military friends in high excitement.

George and I assisted the Frenchmen to row the pirogue. After about 250 miles, our food became low, so we were on slim rations the rest of the journey. When we arrived in sight of Vincennes, the traders pointed out Uncle Michael's house.

Once on land, George and I ran every inch of the way. But it was early in the morning and no one was about. After shouting for some time, a boy came to the door. When he assured us this was Michael Sprinkle's house, we asked him to tell Uncle Michael that George, his brother, and John Upp, his nephew, who had been prisoners of the Potawatomis for two years, had returned.

Uncle Michael appeared immediately. He did not recognize his brother but "Little Johnny" he knew at once. It was a joyous reunion, second only to the one I anticipated when I return to my parents. My uncle demanded that we rest a few days before proceeding home.

While there I met another French trader who knew the Potawatomi language, but little English. When he learned that I knew both, he tried to persuade me to stay in Vincennes in his employ. He would, he said, even send me to school. But nothing could persuade me to delay my departure any longer than necessary.

A week later, George and I started for home with some other traders who were going to Louisville with a boat freighted with furs. My uncle bought a bark canoe for George and me, as there was no room for us in the traders' pirogue. We started out, then, in the canoe behind the traders. All went well until we reached the Ohio, where the current was so swift that we could not keep up with the pirogue. The bottom of our bark canoe had spread so greatly that it was too broad for the surface of the water. Good fortune smiled on us then, in the shape of a drifting, empty canoe. We caught it and then found no difficulty in keeping up and even running ahead of our companions.

When we came in sight of Henderson, we waited for the traders. Then we all rowed along the banks together for a few rods, to where my father's house was situated. My eyes were so full of tears I could scarcely see when we pulled ashore. Standing there a moment to wipe my eyes, I saw a woman washing clothes under the trees. I stared at her, then shouted to George, "That's my mother!"

She heard me and recognized my voice. Not bothering to dry her hands, she ran toward me, embracing me and weeping for joy at the return of a son she had good reason to fear was dead or a captive of the Indians.

Very soon, other citizens learned of our arrival. We were surrounded by almost every person in the village in no time. They crowded around George and me and our families in heart-warming welcome. Even the school children were dismissed to greet us. All this time I clung to my father and mother and they to me.

The only thing that blighted this happy reunion was the thought that little Jacob and Peter would never be returning.

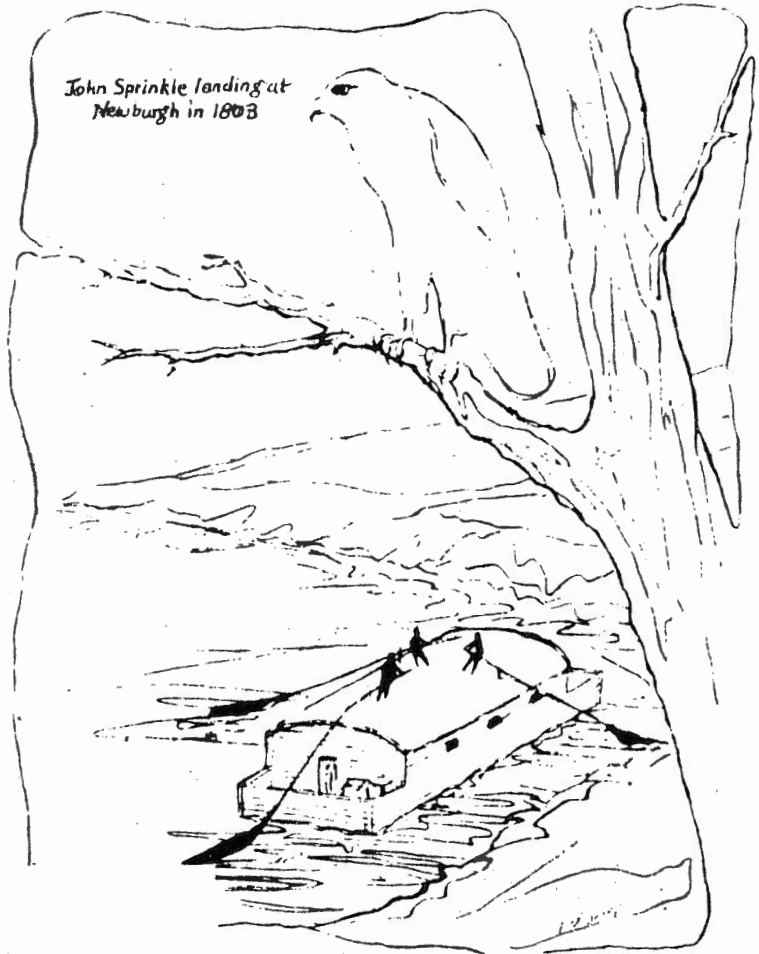

My mother and father subsequently moved to a house on the Green River Road, where both lived to a good old age.

As for me, I am an old man now. The first faint trail of the adventurers was gradually beaten hard by the feet of the emigrants until it became a great thoroughfare, over which thousands have traveled to seek their fortunes in the West.

The mighty forests have disappeared before their progress and cities and towns have sprung up, surrounded by waving fields of grain and tobacco. The Indians have been compelled to move ever westward until now the smoke of their campfires ascends from the shores of the Pacific. The warpaths have been supplanted by canals and even railroads. In fact, it was just about 20 years ago that the great, puffing Iron Horse made its first run between the city of Lexington, on the Kentucky River, to the inland city of Lexington, the center of tobacco growing and horse breeding.

They say the railroad is cheaper, faster and more dependable than other methods of transportation and that it will one day weld the East and West together. Perhaps—who knows—it may furnish me with one more adventure, one pleasanter than being captured by the Potawatomis. I may take a ride on it.

* THE END

History

It was 1803, just 27 years after this Nation declared its Independence that an energetic young blacksmith named John Sprinkle guided his log raft ashore at what today is Newburgh, Indiana.

Here, young Sprinkle chopped his way into a dense forest inhabited only by Red Men to found one of the earliest settlements in Indiana and later to set up the first blacksmith shop in Warrick County.

Nine years later, Sprinkle took another trip on his log raft this time to the Territorial Land Office at Vincennes, Indiana where he obtained two land grants signed by President James Monroe.

Soon after, the already growing community he called Sprinklesburg was surveyed as a town.

Not long after 1812, a settlement called Mount Prospect, separated from Sprinklesburg only by a flat-iron-shaped parcel of ground, was laid out.

The two were joined in 1837 by a special act of the Indiana Legislature which also named the town "Newburgh".

mother, would bring home one or more turkeys. The mother picked the fine feathers off and in a short time had several good beds for her family. In after years, when they could raise geese, she had as many as two hundred at a time, and with the money she received from the sale of the feathers, entered three forty-acre tracts of land.

EARLY DAYS AROUND SPRINKLESBURG, NOW NEWBURG, INDIANA.

Major John Sprinkles made the first settlement in southwestern Warrick County in 1803. At that time there was a settlement at Redbanks, now Henderson, Kentucky, and a few people scattered along the south bank of the Ohio river in Kentucky. A little above where the Major settled was a Shawnee Indian town which was scattered for several miles up and back from the river. This band of Shawnees was under the control of Chief Seeteedown, who, for an Indian, was very well-to-do, having large droves of horses and cattle. These Indians at that time were very peaceable with the few white persons who lived in that section. During the year 1807 two young cousins of the Major's came down the Ohio river in a boat, intending to make a visit and then go on to the Illinois country. The two young men were there for some time with the Major, roaming through the woods. They had come from the old settled section of Pennsylvania and everything seemed new and strange to them.

In the fall, when the deer were at their best and the bear fat upon the mast, the Major and his two kinsmen went a little way back from the river and made a camp, intending to have a week's hunting. They had been hunting two or three days when the two boys had an experience, the marks of which they carried to the end of their lives. They had been following a drove of deer for some time, when they came upon an old bear and two cubs eating acorns under a white oak tree. One of the boys shot one of the small bears, knocking it down. The old mother and the other little one ran off. It seemed that the little bear was only stunned and was not fatally injured and was soon up, staggering around. The young men ran up to it, intending to finish it with their hunting knives. They laid their guns down, but had not quite reached the place where the young bear was until the old mother came at them savagely.

They attempted to get their guns, but before they succeeded, the old bear knocked one of them down. The other got his gun, but it was empty, and rushing at the bear that was fighting his brother, he struck it on the head with the gun barrel. The bear knocked the gun out of his hands with such force that it broke his arm. The other brother, though badly wounded, got his gun and attempted to shoot the bear in the head as it was biting his brother, but his aim was so bad that he only slightly wounded it, and it then turned on him and knocked him down, biting his legs in a fearful manner. The boy with the broken arm stabbed the bear many times with his hunting knife and finally hurt it fatally. It started, however, to follow its two cubs, but had gone only about a hundred yards when it laid down and died. The young men were found by the Major and taken to camp and then to his cabin, where they were for several months before they were able to be out. This experience satisfied them and cured their roving dispositions and they returned to their Pennsylvania homes.

In 1812 the Indians were very bad and everybody had to live in forts. The one which was in the neighborhood where Major Sprinkles lived had a number of families in it, consisting of the Hayes, Lynns, Sprinkles, Alexanders, Darbys, Framers, Wests and Roberts—in all, more than thirty-five persons. It was not regarded as safe for any to live outside of the fort during that year from the first of June to the last of November.

There was a young girl who lived with one of the families who was expecting a sister from central Tennessee. She was very uneasy about her, fearing she had been captured by the Indians. Late one evening, just before dusk, a whining, piteous cry was heard, which did not seem like the scream of the panther, as it was continuous. This girl heard the noise and declared it was the cry of her sister, and nothing could stop her from going out to it.

One of the best known names along the coast in southern Mobile County is Bosarge; also spelled Bousage, Bouzage and Bosarge in various documents. Joseph Bosarge, the first permanent resident of Bayou La Batre, and the father of the Bosarge clan,
was an independent, industrious, and resourceful person, whose main interest was his family and its welfare.
Adequate records are available to piece together an interesting sketch of this pioneer settler and his family. Joseph was literate, and his signature is preserved in several documents.

This pioneer was married in 1763 to Louisa Baudreau, or Vudro. She was the daughter of John Baptiste Baudreau de la Graveline who was one of Bienville's trusted lieutenants and who played a major part in the settlement of the Louisiana Colony. He met a tragic death in Mobile as a result of the miscarriage of justice in the infamous Duclos affair.

Joseph and Louisa's oldest son, John Baptiste, was born on Deer Island in 1766. After the death of Joseph in 1791 in Bayou La Batre this son became the head of the family and exhibited the same high qualities of leadership as his father. He is listed as a taxpayer in Mobile County in 1816, and in the census of 1830 he is listed as the owner of three slaves.

Joseph Bosarge is placed in Mobile in 1770 when he purchased a lot and house for $200 paid for in "horned cattle", from John Favre.
The records also show that in 1773 he sold this same property to Lewis
Maroteaux for $200 cash.

In 1785 Joseph petitioned Miro for a grant on the Batre. In this classic document he states his desire "because of the state of his misery to retire with his wife and children to a piece of land... for the purpose of fishing and planting some corn for the support and maintenance of his family". He requested this grant "that he may live thereon undisturbed, and conceal from the eyes of the world his poverty and misery".

At that time he had the responsibility of a sick wife and seven children. His request for such a grant was dated October 6, 1786
and was approved on November 7, 1786 and consisted of forty arpents.

Hamilton states in his Colonial Mobile that "his misery was not over" for in 1793 Louisa, the widow Bousage, petitioned the Governor of the territory
asking that the Bosage Grant begin where the marsh meets the high ground, rather than at the waters edge. Another settler was encroaching upon the northern part of her claim. Her petition was granted, and she died in Bayou La Batre in 1807 with the knowledge that her heirs owned land suitable for farming and cattle raising.

The Bosarge Grant had been held previously by Barthelemew Gaulotte or Grelot, who was granted
the land but relinquished his title in 1785. Grelot and Bosarge were well known to each other; Grelot was a witness to a Bosarge deed and they are associated in other instances.

The member of the family in early years about which the most information is available is Joseph's daughter, Euphrosine, who was born in 1777. In 1806 she was married to Cornelius McCurtain, an Irishman who took over the Major Farmer, also spelled Farmar, plantation in 1787 at Tensaw after the British left. Previous to Euphrosine's marriage to McCurtain, he and his first wife had moved from Tensaw to St. Stephens in 1790 because the land was in the Tensaw area.

McCurtain had fathered a son who died in infancy,
and his wife also soon passed away. Thus, Euphrosine's husband had been a widower with no heirs. He died in 1807 and his will states that
"Euphrosine McCurtain, the widow Bosarge" was his sole heir.

Thus, she inherited the extensive McCurtain properties. In 1808 she sold a house and lot on Royal Street in Mobile to Benjamin Dubroca, while she retained an adjoining house and lot for her own use. In this deed she is identified as Euphrosine Pomponne Bausage, widow McCurtain

After the death of McCurtain, the widow married Diego McVoy, who was a prominent Mobilian. He held extensive lands, including the former McCurtain tract of 4374 acres between Dog
River and the bay. In 1810 Euphrosine sold her Tensaw property of 1280
arpents to Joshua Kennedy for $650. In March 1815 Diego McVoy was elected to the Mobile City Commission. He was reelected in 1817 and he played an important part in providing the city with improved water facilities and drainage.

Euphrosine died in Mobile in 1845 and is buried in Magnolia Cemetery in that city.

The early Bosarges participated actively in the development of the Gulf Coast with courage and valor in the face of adversity. They fought fire and flood, overcame pestilence, conquered economic hardships, tamed the wilds, and left an enviable heritage.

Sprinkle-Bosarge vows solemnized

Mr. and Mrs. Robert Anthony Bosarge

Mattie Louise Sprinkle became the bride of Robert Anthony Bosarge Nov. 10 at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Clarence Sprinkle Sr., grandparents of the bride.

Mr. Sprinkle officiated at the evening ceremony.

The bride is the daughter of Clarence Sprinkle Jr. of Bayou La Batre, Ala., and Mrs. Jessie Harris of Pascagoula.

The bridegroom's parents are Mr. and Mrs. Richard Bosarge of Bayou La Batre.

The bride, given in marriage by her father, wore a Victorian gown of off-white slipper satin. The high neckline was edged with ivory lace, repeated on the yoke front and deep cuffs. The floor length skirt fell in soft folds from a high waistline.

The bride's shoulder length veil of illusion drifted from a headpiece of beaded lace leaves and she carried miniature pink rosebuds accented with pearl hearts and tied with pink satin ribbons ending in love knots.

The bride's only attendant was her sister, Karen Harris.

For her daughter's wedding Mrs. Harris wore a brown knit with orange trim and matching accessories. The bridegroom's mother chose a Kelly green two-piece ensemble with matching accessories.

For a wedding trip to Alabama the bride selected a black ensemble. The couple is now living in Bayou La Batre.

Mr. J. W. Campbell, press agent of the great Sells & Gray united shows, dropped into Biloxi last evening.

The board of supervisors of Harrison county will hold their regular monthly meeting for November at Mississippi City tomorrow.

A new postoffice has been created in Harrison county called Dewnouth, of which Miss Lillard D. Durham has been commissioned postmistress.

The materials for the new Charles residence on the beach are being hauled to the site. It is not improbable a start will be made on the structure this week.

The second story of the Bolton building is rapidly going up, most of the frames for the openings having been put in position, and the walls being under good headway.

Night before last Constable Pollard captured a young negro boy from Seranton who ran away from there with the Great Eastern circus, that played in Biloxi that night. Yesterday the boy's mother came over after him and took him back home.

J. M. Breeland, one of the most prominent citizens of Vancleave, was in Biloxi yesterday making a personal canvass in the interest of his friend, Hon. M. M. Evans, who is a candidate for state treasurer. Mr. Breeland is very hopeful of the success of Mr. Evans, who, by the way, is a Harrison county man.

For the past two weeks Martin Hass has been so busily engaged in disposing of the fire damaged goods of the Biloxi Hardware Co. that he had little time to attend to the business of plumbing and bicycle repairing. Now that the stock has been disposed of he is prepared to give prompt attention to all work in his line and at reasonable figures.

The city council of Biloxi will meet in regular session next Tuesday night, one of the most serious cases was that of Henry Tremier and Joe Lepre, who were arrested for disorderly conduct, were each fined in sum of $2.50 and costs; George Gilmore, colored, charged with disorderly conduct, was taxed in the sum of $10 and costs, and on another charge of threats was discharged. Gilmore was the negro who was mysteriously released from jail, and said another negro named Taylor was responsible for his release.

Sheriff and Tax Collector Ramsay, assisted by Deputy Henley, was again at the city hall yesterday, receiving and receipting for state and county taxes. The sheriff informs us that his collections have not only been quite large, but most satisfactory. Hereafter those who owe these dues will have to go down to Mississippi City to settle up, which will be an inconvenience that would have been overcome, if they had squified up whilst the collector was here. The total collection of taxes for the two days has been about $3600. 11-3-1901

At 6 o'clock last night there died in Biloxi one of the oldest citizens of the place, as well as one of the oldest of the natives. The decedent was Mr. Jerome Ryan, who was born here 83 years ago, and whose father was likewise a native, but whose mother came from Canada. Mr. Ryan was one of the best known characters of the city, and was held in universal esteem and respect. He leaves five daughters, one son and hosts of relatives to mourn his demise, and The Herald tenders them its sincerest condolences. The funeral will take place from the family residence on Washington street, at 3:30 o'clock this (Sunday) afternoon.

Mr. Charles H. Owens, of the firm of John F. Barnes & Co., architects and builders, who have been doing a great deal of work in Biloxi within the past few years, yesterday morning stole a march on his friends, and joined the company, and of the happy occasion the wedding was given. The groom is a most clever gentleman, worthy of the fair bride, and she being a young and charming girl. The heartiest best wishes are given, and the wedding was most successful. Immediate money the new couple parted for Molokai to make their time to home performed at the dinner by Rev. Mr. T.

Norman H. Davis Is Chairman Special Commission.

GENEVA, Feb. 10.—(By Assoc Press).—Much interest has been shown in league circles by a letter from the ambassador's conference on the subject of the Memel dispute, which ambassadors turned over to the League of Nations for action. In accordance the covenant the league appointed a special commission, with an American chairman, Norman H. Davis. This commission will open its inquiry at Memel tomorrow.

The ambassadors' conference writes that since the league has taken this step it has written to the Lithuanian government defending anew the claim of the Memel convention, which Lithuania rejected, at the same time intimating the league that any real inquiry should support the general standpoint advanced by the ambassadors.

The league considers this step amounting to interference by the ambassadors' conference in a matter, which being helpless to solve itself, it passes to the league for settlement.

Mr. Davis and his fellow commissioners are described as being annoyed at the ambassadors' action, but are deterred to proceed with an independent inquiry. The whole subject is complicated by the fact that the ambassadors cannot be eliminated from any eventual settlement because they still have a voice in the disposal of the Memel territory, which formerly belonged to Germany.

PEACE TO TRIUMPH WILSON DECLAR

PHILADELPHIA, Pa., Feb. 10.—Memorial exercises for Woodrow Wilson held here today in the Academy of Music. The speakers included Josephus Daniels, former secretary of the navy; Franklin D. Roosevelt, wife of a former assistant secretary of the navy; R. S. Morris, former ambassador to Japan and George W. Norris, governor of Philadelphia federal reserve bank.

Mr. Daniels described his last meeting with the former president a few weeks before his death. "I was more or less wallowing in the failure of his peace plan," said Mr. Daniels. "He replied, 'you be sure there will be a peace between nations. In that sense we have made concessions to providence that arrangements shall be different from those I designed, but peace triumph.' I realized then that he had done the work of an immortal, and success would be his ultimately."

The other speakers dwelt on achievements and personal character of Mr. Wilson. Memorial services for the former president also were held in churches.

Mr. Daniels is in Philadelphia preparing a prospectus for a book on the life of former President Wilson he is with Philadelphia publishers.
